This week three of our readers explain why they travel. . . .

Many people travel to learn about foreign cultures and go sightseeing. Well, for me, there's a more important reason. I used to travel with friends, but lately I prefer traveling alone. When I traveled with my friends, we were always compromising. I prefer camping, but they always had to stay in nice hotels. I like getting up early, but they preferred to sleep late. I work hard all year, so to me, vacation time should be "me" time – a time for seeing new places and having new experiences, but most of all, a time for getting to know the real me. —Dana

I love traveling because it gives my husband and me a chance to leave all the problems of work behind us and really focus on our sons. They're very young, so we go on trips that are close to our home in California. We have a big van that we use for camping (I think my husband married me because I've never liked hotels!), and we've used it for road trips to several national parks around here. We think it's important to teach the kids to appreciate nature, and we find it's more relaxing to stay close to home. We don't like worrying about being late and missing a flight, and we hate airports. —Sheila

I used to travel because I love learning about different cultures outside of the United States, but five years ago I started traveling to "give back." My past trips – especially to countries that are not as rich as the United States – have helped me realize how lucky I am. Now I travel because I'm interested in "voluntourism" – traveling as a volunteer. Last year I taught English to village children in Haiti. This year I'm going to Africa to help doctors at a hospital in Kenya. The people appreciate our work, and that makes me feel good about myself. – Wanda
