Fame and Celebrity

ABRAHAM LINCOLN was certainly famous, but it would seem odd to call him a “celebrity.” A celebrity is a famous person, but fame and celebrity aren’t the same thing.

Traditionally, people became famous because they were exceptional, unique, or made a significant contribution to society. They may have belonged to a royal family or accomplished something important as a politician, an author, a scientist, or a businessperson. This was true even just a century ago. More recently, however, the power of mass media has changed the nature of fame. The people everyone knows today are more likely to be professional athletes, movie actors, and television-show hosts. They are “celebrities,” and they achieve their fame largely because they are often seen in the media. Even an ordinary person can become well-known (if only for a brief period) simply by appearing on a TV show that is seen by millions of viewers.

Accordingly, celebrity means something quite different from fame. While fame is often based on achievement and is expected to be long-lasting, celebrity seems more a matter of luck. And it can be very brief. In the 1960s, Andy Warhol – who was himself both an important artist and a celebrity – predicted that “in the future, everybody will be world-famous for fifteen minutes.” Not everyone has had their fifteen minutes yet, but the growing power of the media has brought us one step closer.

1. All famous people are celebrities.
a. True b. False c. Doesn't say
2. Today, few people are interested in royalty.
a. True b. False c. Doesn't say
3. In the past, ordinary people didn't usually become famous.
a. True b. False c. Doesn't say
4. The media is largely responsible for the creation of celebrities.
a. True b. False c. Doesn't say
5. Andy Warhol's predictions have already come true.
a. True b. False c. Doesn't say
